Red blood cell antigens determine your blood group. The antigens expressed on the red blood cell determine an individual's blood group. The main two blood groups are called ABO (with blood types A, B, AB, and O) and Rh (with Rh D-positive or Rh D-negative blood types).

Blood group antigens are surface markers on the red blood

International Society of Blood Transfusion has recently recognized 33 blood group systems. Apart from ABO and Rhesus system, many other types of antigens have been noticed on the red cell membranes.

In addition, ABO blood group antigens can be altered by hematological cancers that can modify the sugar chains that bear the ABO blood group antigens, leading to the use of the A and B antigens as tumor markers for acute leukemia, myeloproliferative disorders, and myelodysplasia.

The ABO blood group - Blood Groups and Red Cell Antigens

Blood group antigens play a role in recognizing foreign cells in the bloodstream. For example, if a person with blood type A receives a blood transfusion with blood type B, the recipient's immune system will recognize the type B cells as foreign and mount an immune response.

Many of these blood group antigens fall into one of 26 blood group systems, genetically discrete groups of antigens controlled by a single gene or cluster of two or three closely linked homologous genes (Table 1.1). Some of these systems, notably Rh and MNS, are highly complex.

Blood group antigens are present on cell surface molecule of wide structural diversity including carbohydrate epitope on glycoprotein/lipid and peptide antigens. Although all blood group antigens are serologically detectable on red blood cells, most of them are also expressed in non-erythroid tissues.
