Print and download in PDF or MIDI The Butterfly. The violin and guitar parts were copied from existing sheet music, though some minor edits were made to make it more accurate to the recording. The percussion was by ear and the piano had some creative license because it was hard to hear and I guessed. Some parts are quiet because this was formatted for MIDI export.

As a wedding song, this poem claims to be created for a specific occasion, but is occasional only as a literary artifice. The much simpler Locrian Song seems to be an isolated representative of a vast body of lost popular poetry. On women in relation to Greek literature and society, see Gail HolstWarhaft, Dangerous Voices (1992).

Gallimard says Song was a fool to show him the truth, because all he loved was the lie Butterfly represented. Song seems surprised and hurt. He realizes, thinking aloud, that Gallimard never really loved him the way he believed he did. Gallimard tells Song: "I am a man who loved a woman created by a man. Everything else" simply falls short.
